I am building an audio player app that can play a list of up to 128 songs and I was wondering if it is possible to play the audio directly from the device's storage (which I have full read/write access) when the user clicks a play button? Instead of it sending it to the media player which then can process and buffer the data? A: Unfortunately not. You need to play the sound data somewhere before you can send the playback request to the device. You can use the MediaRecorder API, but that means encoding the audio first, which then needs to be decoded. The MediaPlayer API does the encoding and decoding, and it may be possible to do the decode without sending the audio file to the MediaPlayer (do you give an example of what you have tried so far?). On android, the android.
