In my cloud code, I'm trying to parse objects that are returned from a query and store them in a set. I'm doing a query on an item within my collection called "Items". It's almost working but I'm struggling to actually get the objects back from the query. I can see the objects within the query but not in the items array. The parse.com docs state: "Note: you must use a query to fetch remote objects. " However when I write the below within my cloud code, the items.length is zero. When I call the exact same query, it works fine. I'm doing a query on an item within my collection called "Items" I can see the objects within the query but not in the items array. Parse.Cloud.define("runQuery", function(request, response) { var query = new Parse.Query("Item"); query.equalTo("xid", request.params.xid); query.first({ success: function (queryResult) { response.success(queryResult); }, error: function () { response.error("Error occurred");

I haven't written about this already, but if you want to see the "worst-case" scenario about what could happen if Syria ultimately falls to ISIS then you might want to watch the video below and/or read this article (link provided).Â I've received numerous replies and questions (as well as some comments that I'm not going to bother replying to) re: my article on Syria.Â The article itself contains a number of questionable claims, some of them will have to do with the battle of Aleppo and ISIS, some will have to do with how one should define "terrorism" and the like.Â These are very personal views to me and have no official or authoritative position at all in any way, shape or form.Â Also, the White House issued its "call for restraint" in the ongoing Syrian conflict this morning and you can read the press release and the official statement here. Anyways, I thought that this response would be of interest to some of you so I will briefly explain
