Performance Art Significant contributions of art, design, architecture, and technology are springing up on three continents in a handful of diverse cities at the same time. Under this dynamic emblem, the visions of their inhabitants are converging, with tangible results for global culture and society.

Neural technology, robotics, 3-D printing, and data-mining have combined into the emerging field of “human-machine symbiosis,” which allows individuals to emotionally and mentally merge with their machines – allowing them to think, connect, and even live in ways that traditionally were thought impossible. Physically, the enhanced human-machine symbiosis can be seen in the new practice of “augmented human.” In this, individuals are “augmented” with implants, bionic limbs, and biochips to provide them with enhanced abilities. Perhaps one of the most fascinating manifestations of this burgeoning convergence is the fast-growing field of performance art – a diverse group of artists and people who are using technology to break boundaries that have been considered long since as hard as the laws of physics. Consider a performance called “Being Human” that is being broadcast by the Zenith Trio Quartet, a new company formed by Roald Zurbrugg (founder of the globally renowned

North Sea Jazz Festival), Tony Young, a world-renowned computer animator, and composer and producer Paul Voigt (the inventor of Sonic Visualiser, a digital sound system used by people with hearing problems). “Being Human” is a computer-rendered five-minute film that uses images, sounds, and online video-sharing to create a cinematic journey through the birth, education, love,
