the hack was reported by a coworker at a major us electronics manufacturer, who works with next generation intel wireless chipsets: intel has a chip called "bluetooth altivec", which computes the dot product of two vectors, a value that's used to encode data to be transferred over bluetooth. hacking into this chip and using it to transmit arbitrary data could, in theory, allow an attacker to sniff out private information such as the plaintext contents of a cell phone's secure element and plaintext data such as credit card numbers transmitted over the air. the aclu says it's the first known time the federal government has used a private entity to hack a third party. the aclu is concerned that this is the first known time anyone's personal information has been exploited in this way. the us department of justice paid us$1.6 million to bt3g as part of its "operation in a nutshell" program, which used intelligence provided by bt3g to surveil activists on the streets of new york city during the rnc: in a press release from the aclu that was posted on the group's website, it stated, the government has been expanding its efforts to spy on peaceful protest with no probable cause. in doing so, the government has hired private companies that specialize in buying and sharing the information of innocent people, and providing it to the government. a single misconfiguration by a security firm's users gave a north american isp access to a customer's unencrypted wireless traffic: on tuesday, a security researcher published information on a north american internet service provider (isp) that provides wired and wireless internet service to customers in seven states and four canadian provinces. the researcher goes by the username "thec0d3" and through a series of security tests in a virtual lab managed by security testing firm securityhead (source).
